National Science Foundation Grant SES-2141551. Principal Investigator. “Creating the Federal Judicial Database and Research Agenda.” Law and Science Program. 2022-2025. $483,086.

Project Summary: The Federal Judicial Database (FJDB) project is developing a comprehensive biographical, attribute, and background database on the more than 4,000 Article III federal district and circuit judges serving from 1789-present. The FJDB is modernizing the process of compiling judicial biographical data and will result in the creation of an infrastructure and public interface that is sustainable for long-term data gathering, dissemination, and broad accessibility for researchers, students, the media, and policymakers alike.

1 Books

Boyd, Christina L., Paul M. Collins, Jr., and Lori A. Ringhand. Supreme Bias: Gender and Race in U.S. Supreme Court Confirmation Hearings. In press, Stanford University Press (Fall 2023 expected release).

Project Summary: In Supreme Bias, we examine the dynamics of gender and race at the Supreme Court confirmation hearings held before the Senate Judiciary Committee. The book uses extensive new data and qualitative evidence to highlight how the women and people of color who have sat before the Committee have faced a significantly different confirmation process than their white male colleagues. Despite being among the most qualified and well-credentialed lawyers of their respective generations, our evidence indicates that female nominees and nominees of color face more skepticism of their professional competence, are subjected to stereotype-based questioning, are more frequently interrupted, and are described in less-positive terms by senators.

Research in Progress

- Elise N. Blasingame,* Christina L. Boyd, Roberto F. Carlos, and Joseph T. Ornstein. "How the Trump Administration's Quota Policy Transformed Immigration Judging." Under Review (Invited to Revise & Resubmit).

Abstract: With federal immigration courts facing substantial case backlogs, in October 2018 the Trump administration imposed a controversial performance quota policy on immigration judges. The political motivations were clear: to pressure immigration judges to order more removals as quickly as possible. Typical presidential methods to constrain immigration judges' behavior are weak, but this policy and its threat of employment sanctions made it more likely to generate political responsiveness. To assess whether this occurred, we employ an interrupted time series analysis on hundreds of thousands of judicial decisions from 2012-2020. Our analysis demonstrates that the policy successfully altered immigration judge behavior in the Trump administration's desired direction, with higher rates of in absentia and merits removal orders resulting, particularly among those judges needing to shift their behavior to comply. Our findings have significant implications for immigration judge independence, due process protections for noncitizens, and presidential efforts to control the federal bureaucracy.

Boyd, Christina L., Paul M. Collins, Jr., and Lori A. Ringhand. “Gender, Race, and Interruptions at Supreme Court Confirmation Hearings.” Under Review.

Abstract: When political actors show disrespect to one another based on gender or race, this highlights inequalities that have important ramifications for the political system and our broader society. We examine whether gender and racial bias affects interruption rates at one of the most visible events in American politics: U.S. Supreme Court confirmation hearings. Using original data from 1939 to 2022, we find that male and white participants are more likely to interrupt women and person of color speakers, respectively, relative to male and white speakers. This finding holds for both senators and nominees as interrupters. Our results provide evidence that biased interruptive behavior occurs in even the most public and salient of political settings and that it can be mitigated (or intensified) by shared (or opposite) partisanship among speaking pairs. We also find interruption inequalities are not isolated to women as the interrupted, confirming for the first time that people of color in political and legal settings are subject to heightened rates of interruptions as well.

Baker, Matthew E.,* Christina L. Boyd, Aidan N. González,* and Karson A. Pennington.* “Race and Gender in Judicial Selection in the United States” in Michael P. Fix and Matthew Montgomery, eds. Research Handbook on Judicial Politics. Edward Elgar Publishing. Under Review.

Chapter Summary: This chapter explores the impact of race and gender in judicial selection in federal and state courts. We first focus on federal selection, highlighting the distinctive process and obstacles faced by people of color and women Supreme Court and lower court nominees during presidential selection and Senate confirmation. Broadening to the state courts, we look at the historic first female and person of color judges and then examine how different selection systems impact representation on the bench. Throughout the chapter, the common theme of politics dominates. At both the state and federal levels, we see that the decision to prioritize or fight (explicitly or implicitly) the selection of women and persons of color as judges is often driven by the promise of political benefits. As we conclude the chapter, we highlight some lessons gleaned from the expanded diversity on the bench and what policy makers can do to continue the march onward.
